

Evening Telegraph PUBLISHED EVERY AFTERNOON (SUNDAYS EXCEPTED) AT THE EVENING TELEGRAPH BUILDING, NO. 108 S. THIRD STREET, PHILADELPHIA. THURSDAY, JUNE 3, 1869.

BRITISH BLUSTER ABOUT THE ALABAMA TREATY.

New evidences of the commingled alarm, disappointment, and rage caused in Great Britain by the contemptuous rejection of the Alabama treaty and the accompanying speech of Senator Sumner, continue to be forwarded, not only by the cable telegrams which briefly summarize the news from day to day, but also by the foreign mails, which give in detail the speeches and arguments of leading British statesmen and journals. This continued excitement can only be explained by the peculiar interests involved and the present position of parties in England. One of the clauses of the Alabama treaty provided for the adjustment of all outstanding claims between the two countries, and it was distinctly understood that we were to receive no compensation for the destruction of our vessels, unless we agreed to pay all demands against our own Government which a mixed commission might pronounce valid. The most imposing British claim of this character is the Confederate loan taken by British sympathizers with the Rebellion, and no better evidence of the supposed effect of the Alabama treaty upon this investment is needed than the fact that it advanced materially in value at the London Stock Exchange—we believe about ten per cent.—as soon as the nature of the Johnson-Clarendon diplomacy became generally known. The lords and lairds, who so foolishly contributed millions of pounds sterling to the needy treasury of the Confederacy, imagined that a plan had been devised whereby the people of the United States would be compelled to reimburse their losses. Now, however, since this nation respectfully but firmly declines to foot the bill run up by its destruction, great is the confusion, consternation, and disappointment of the Confederate bondholders at finding their desperate financial prospects rendered more desperate than ever. Then the shipping merchants of Great Britain, naturally alarmed at the terrible injuries they would suffer, if in a rebellion of British colony America fitted out Alabamas to prey on English commerce, are disheartened at the failure to cancel on cheap terms their own precedent, and to hold us under bonds not to imitate their example.

Aside from these considerations, the necessities of British partisanship have materially increased the prevailing agitation. The Tories are out of power, and, badly whipped by the Whigs on the old issues, they are industriously seeking a new one. Nothing would suit their purpose better than a war with America, provided they could find a decent pretext for such a conflict. When John Bull goes forth to fight his neighbors he marshals his forces under a Tory banner. When peace prevails, and the people have time and opportunity to reflect upon their wrongs, and to calmly review the monstrosities embodied in the standard British policy, their sense of justice compels them to make some advance in the path of progress, and to move forward, even though it be by inches, under Whig leadership. At this moment the rival British politicians are cautiously fighting their own battle over our shoulders. The Whigs are restrained from a manly and straightforward recognition of our rights by the fear that the Tories will get up a hue and cry that they are bartering away the rights and honor of the nation. The Tories, on the other hand, anxious as they may be for a war, cannot afford to jeopardize commercial and manufacturing interests without giving a plausible reason for extreme measures. They content themselves for the present with saying, "See what a quarrelsome and ungracious pack these Yankees are! We offered them everything they could in justice demand when we were in power. In no event should they receive a single new concession. Since they are not satisfied with our magnanimous proffers, all further demands must be sternly resisted, and, if need be, we are ready to welcome another war." The Whigs adopt a more insidious tone. They deplore the rejection of the treaty. They attack certain portions of Mr. Sumner's speech, and make labored arguments to prove that some of its positions are untenable; they stoutly assert that in no event will they accede to unreasonable demands; but they generally unite in the opinion that peaceful discussion of the question is by no means exhausted; that human wisdom was not all embodied in the Alabama treaty; and that if war is to come, America and not Great Britain must be the active aggressor.

The feeling last referred to is well displayed in various articles published in THE TELEGRAPH yesterday. The London News, a leading Whig journal, in referring to Mr. Motley's arrival in London, rejoices that a difficult question will now be removed "from the region of unofficial debate and rhetorical exaggeration into that of a business statement and diplomatic negotiation;" while the London Star (John Bright's organ), referring to the same subject, alleges that "England loves peace, and that a determination to do justice animates the Ministry." Mr. Forster, who is connected with the present Cabinet, while he combated in his recent speech many of Mr. Sumner's arguments, at the same time expressed a profound conviction that there would be no war, and that "if there be danger at all, it is danger in America."

On the other hand, the Tory disposition to pick a quarrel is displayed in the boast of the Pall Mall Gazette that "America has backed down before British bluster"—an assertion as insulting as it is untrue; and the labored attempt of Sir Francis Head to revive reminiscences connected with the Canada rebellion, whatever may be the intention, has the same effect of reviving old animosities. If the dead past is to be raked up, we will begin to think of the employment of savages to scalp and slaughter white Americans in the last two wars with Great Britain, and of the wanton destruction of the Capitol buildings by British troops.

THE ADOPTION OF THE SPANISH CONSTITUTION.

If there is any merit in deliberation, the Spanish Government of the future ought to be a model of its kind. The new constitution has finally been adopted by the Constituent Cortes by the large vote of 214 to 55, and the first great step towards a reorganization may therefore be said to be complete. It cannot be charged that this action of the Cortes has been hasty or ill-advised: the whole subject has been discussed thoroughly in all its phases, and the new constitution, if its provisions are carried out in a proper spirit, ought to cause a revival of that old Castilian spirit that at one time made Spain the foremost nation in the world. Contrary to the rumors that had been circulated to the contrary, the Republican members of the Cortes did not refuse to give in their adherence to the will of the majority, but through one of their leaders they announced that, although opposed to the monarchical clauses of the Constitution, they would support it in full. This is the only course that patriotic men could take under the circumstances, and if the Republicans will give a steady adherence to the new Government, they can do much to check any tendencies towards despotism and materially advance the cause of liberty.

One great difficulty still remains to be surmounted, and that is the choice of a suitable person to fill the vacant throne. Among all the candidates who have been mentioned, there is not one that can be considered as exactly the right man for the place; and if in choosing a king the old traditions of royalty are adhered to, it will be almost impossible to find among the reigning families of Europe a prince who will combine the essentials of blue blood and brains, and who, if personally unobjectionable, will not be fettered by his family connections. As the Spaniards, however, have managed tolerably well for a good while without either a king or constitution, they can perhaps get along for some time to come without a prince upon the throne as the figure-head of the ship of state.

The future prosperity of Spain, and her only security against a relapse into a despotism as onerous, if not as contemptible, as that of Isabella II, will be in the education of the people and the perfect freedom of religion. Priestcraft has been the bane of the country ever since the times of Ferdinand and Isabella; and the only way in which the influence of the clergy in politics can be prevented is by a school system, a free press, and an immunity for all shades of religious belief. It is to these points that patriotic Spaniards will have to direct their attention, and in their advocacy and defense all the energies of the Republicans should be directed.

SUCH IS FAME.

The New York Herald has discovered that this city has sustained a great loss in the death of "Dr. Rush, Health Officer of Philadelphia." The Herald, however, thinks that the deceased is better dead than alive; in fact, that his chief claim to fame consists in the fact that he is dead, and "commends his example in this respect to health officers elsewhere," not because in dying he became a public benefactor by bequeathing an immense fortune to a public institution, but because in his will he bequeathed against those "teachers of disjointed thinking, the daily newspapers"—from which it infers that his brains were altogether too added for the brains of a health officer. Now the occasion of all this muddling by the Herald consists in the fact that Swinburne is the health officer of New York, and the Herald thinks that Swinburne's brains are in quite as added a condition as were those of the late health officer of our own city. Of course, we know even less about this man Swinburne than the Herald does about Dr. Rush. There is, indeed, a Swinburne known to fame, a certain poetaster whose brains, we had supposed, were anything but added, and whom we had been led to believe was and still is a subject of her Britannic Majesty. Yet we will not venture to question the superior knowledge of the Herald, but will join with it in lamenting the miserable fate of New York in being subjected, in matters of health, to the added sway of such a little, limping, inactive, and unintellectual antediluvian as the author of "Laus Veneris" and "Atlantia in Caledon." Moreover, we will unite with the Herald in pressing upon the attention of Swinburne the example of our late health officer, and urge upon him the expediency and wisdom of forthwith giving up the ghost. Like Dr. Rush, he will then become "a health officer who has made himself famous by dying."

A NOBLE CHARITY.

Mr. W. W. CORCORAN has supplemented his handsome donation of pictures for the formation of a national art gallery at Washington by an act of munificent charity which is even more praiseworthy. He has established a "Home for Indigent Widows," to be dedicated to the memory of his deceased wife, which, with the buildings and grounds connected with them, will cost $200,000 or more. It is designed to provide neat and comfortable quarters for sixty widows of officers, clerks, and other public servants, who may be in need of assistance, and the management of the institution is to be placed in the hands of five Washington ladies. Mr. Corcoran's long residence at the national capital has impressed upon him the necessity of just such a charity, and the class of persons whom he proposes to relieve are, as a rule, eminently worthy. Many officers of the Government who have served the public faithfully for a long series of years on small salaries leave their families in absolute want, and this "Home" will be a grateful retreat for women who in their old age find themselves suddenly left destitute and unable to work, even if work is obtainable. Mr. Corcoran during the Rebellion was well known as a Rebel sympathizer, but charity covers a multitude of sins, and, in view of such a noble use of his great wealth, we can afford to forget the past.

THE INQUIRY of the system of licensed gambling which has long prevailed upon the continent of Europe is gradually making an impression upon the legislators of the petty sovereignties by which it has been principally tolerated. Several of the insignificant German duchies, whose chief glory and main source of revenue have consisted in their licensed gambling dens, have passed laws abolishing the system, the date for carrying these laws into effect being usually placed some years into the future. And now Belgium has followed their example, the Chamber of Representatives of that country having voted recently that the gaming tables at Spa shall be suppressed on and after October 31, 1872. If the Belgian Chamber had been true to the best interests of their country, and especially to those of the thousands of strangers who frequent the Spa every year, it would not have postponed the overthrow of the institution more than three years; but it will be better to be rid of it then than not at all.

THE GRAND ANNEXATION POLICY of Bismarck has contributed not a little to the glory and nominal strength of Prussia, but the people of all the petty sovereignties which have been absorbed are not entirely acquiescent in the new order of things. A short time since an election for deputy to the North German Parliament was held in Hanover, and it is announced that, out of about 16,000 votes, M. Ewald, an avowed partisan of the deposed King, obtained 8845, or more than one-half, while only 3970 were given to the candidate of the Liberal national party. The new deputy was formerly a professor in the University of Göttingen, and will probably be found, on his entrance in the Parliament of the Confederation, a formidable opponent of Count Von Bismarck and his policy of suppression.

OBITUARY.

Captain William H. West. On the 30th of May last, Captain William H. West, well known in this city, and of fame upon the waters, died at sea. He was a son of Captain West, for many years commander of the Pacific, one of the Collins line of steamers. In the early periods of his life the deceased sailed from this port, successively commanding, and most ably, skillfully, and satisfactorily, a number of vessels. When the Texas rebellion broke out, he entered the United States Volunteer Navy, receiving the commission of Lieutenant. The United States supply steamer Massachusetts was commanded by him for two years, and while upon her quarter-deck he increased his previous reputation as a brave and efficient officer. When the war closed he quitted the navy, and was tendered the command of the steaming Quaker City, running between New York and Charleston. Upon this vessel he did a gallant and noble deed. It will be remembered that he it was who rescued the passengers and crew of the steamship which was burned off Cape Hatteras in the year 1867. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company next offered him a position in its service, and he died while in command of the Golden City. His body will be brought to this city for interment.
